ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Although each of my more than 20 books has been a collaborative affair, no project has involved more people with more intensive effort than Reframing Teacher Leadership to Improve Your School. My first and most important acknowledgments are to the educators and school leaders who voted with their hearts, minds, conscience, and feet, displaying their work, warts and all, to their colleagues, their local stakeholders, and now the world. You can find their names and action research projects in Appendix A, but such a listing fails to do justice to their intellectual energy and personal courage. If you want to see teacher leadership in action, my words take a distant second place to the daily actions of these classroom educators and school leaders.

Although the popular refrain among critics is to bewail central office administrative positions as a useless appendage unrelated to teaching and learning, we must occasionally let evidence intrude on prejudice. Karlene Lee, Arlene Lewis, Gwen Marchand, and their colleagues are walking evidence of the proposition that there is no contradiction between central office administration and deep and abiding care for students and teachers. I also wish to acknowledge the support and cooperation of Chief Academic Officer Lauren Kohut-Ross and Superintendent Walt Rulffes, along with the support of State Superintendent Keith Rheault and Public Education Foundation Chair Vaughna Bendickson.

Cathy Shulkin reviewed and edited every word of the manuscript, saving me a thousand times from embarrassment as I seek to translate ideas into words, sometimes forgetting that the reader may not understand that a change in flights does not excuse the omission of an explanatory transition.

My colleagues at the Leadership and Learning Center have been especially helpful in this project. In particular, I wish to acknowledge Laura Besser, Ramona Gonzales, and Robin Hoey for reviews of the quantitative and qualitative data; Larry Ainsworth, Elle Allison, Connie Kamm, Brian McNulty, and Stephen White for their intellectual inspiration; and Nan Caldwell, Peggy Lush, and Jason Mueller for their service to the participants in this project and exceptional attention to detail.

Every time I acknowledge my family's role in my research and work it is inadequate and late. As every parent knows, the distance from the first ultrasound image to the first college tuition payment is but the blink of an eye. As Julia heads to college, I will hold in my mind the image of the giggly kindergartner she was only moments ago. Her brothers, James and Alex, are young men of whom I am especially proud, not because of my influence but because of their choices of service, scholarship, and familial support. Brooks is on the path to becoming a teacher, making his father, grandfather, grandmother, and several previous generations of teachers prior to that burst with pride.

Douglas Reeves, Swampscott, Massachusetts
